KING TUT.

Old King Tut was a shrewd old nut,
A Prince of ancient race,
From Pharaoh-hood before the flood
His ancestry he could trace.
He made no kick when he took sick,
Though he'd been going some
And he died game, just the same,
When he knew his time had come.

He was wise, did not disguise
His trouble and distress,
Law facts ahead when he was dead
The future was no guess.
He was discreet, swort he would cheat
The robbers of this age ;
So you can see as well as me
That King Tut was a sage.

When about to croak, thus he spoke
In grave and solemn tone,
If you will do my wishes true
I'll die without a groan,
For well I know, before I go
That I must not neglect,
From morbid fools and graveyard ghouls
My body to protect.

Upon our race just one disgrace
That remorse my soul doth prick
When that Israelite, put up a fight,
And Moses turned the trick.
But may my soul, reach the goal
Climb high the family tree
For at great cost, our chariots lost
Chasing Moses through the sea.

Your attention pay, to what I say
As I shake this mortal coil,
I will be no use to make excuse,
My rules you'll find in boyle,
A dangerous fate, if you hesitate
To shirk a King's demand,
May the dread of my ghost when dead,
Enforce my last demand.

Of secret tricks, one is to mix
Deadly poison with my gail,
Before I join in exile, first saturate
My body in Alcohol.
Wrap me in hides well tanned and dried,
I the best on earth deserve,
At the last inspection, the resurrection,
A Pharaoh well preserved.

In King's valley, where spirits rally,
Where Lordly Pharaoh's rest,
Where mummies wait, none but the great,
The fittest and the best.
Bury me deep in peaceful sleep,
Till the resurrection morn,
I'll arise with those when Gabriel blows
Upon his golden horn.

In the mountain I'll be, there is a place
I long ago selected,
To tell the truth, all through my youth
This important plan neglected.
Take a thousand slaves, dig their graves,
Out in the ante-room ;
When tomb's complete, let their corpses sleep
With their secret in the gloom.

Hew in the stone a mummy throne
And store with jewels rare,
No meagre bits, for spirit's tips,
Three thousand years of care,
And may my curse for those that nurse
A desire to disturb,
May they be seized with loath disease,
Their cries in hell be heard.

BASEBALL

OPENING HOME GAME. NAPANEE DEFEATS ADOLPHUSTOWN 12-6

Napanee baseball team defeated the unbeaten Adolphustown nine 12-6 on Wednesday afternoon. One of the largest crowds in years to witness a local game, was in attendance and gave the team great support. This was very conspicuous when compared with the support extended in the past two years. The whole team responded nobly and gave the fans what they paid to see—a real game.

Great credit goes to Jack Adams, the manager. Jack has instilled into the team the "pep" which he put into his rookey games. Besides his managing duties, which takes up a great majority of his spare time, he has been forced to attend to all the work which several committees were elected to do. By his "smile" on Wednesday we know that Jack was satisfied with his labours. Good support is all he asks, and in return he promises a winning team.

Napanee was never in danger at any time during the game. Four runs were tallied in the first innings, giving "Mag" Loucks a good lead to work on. "Mag" pitched a very steady game, and pulled himself out of several bad holes. Ross Loucks caught in his old-time style, and had the Adolphustown players hugging the bases as though they were married to them. Jack Caldwell was going strong, considering the fact that he was leaving directly after the game, to enter into matrimonial entanglements. We all wish Jack and his bride the best of luck.

Pansy Stewart, brother Jack and Carter, looked after the remainder of the infield in satisfactory style. Fraser, Johnston and VanAlstine in the outfield made the latter's work easy.

Every man on the team had safe hits. Several "Babe Ruth's" have been brought to light. Twin Johnson and Ross Loucks and the Stewarts gave the ball several long rides. With his team working in perfect harmony, and full of the fighting spirit, Jack Adams hopes to go considerable distance in the finals.

Adolphustown played their usual steady game, but failed to hit when hits meant runs. Alex Allen in left field made two very sensational catches, which would have gone for triples.

Mr. Stewart, from Yarker, handled the game ably and in a manner quite satisfactory to both sides.

Napanee plays Newburgh in Napanee on Wednesday afternoon, July 20th. Come and give the boys your support and see a good game.

W. H. J. HAINES,
Liberal Candidate for Addington.

THE ELECTIONS

There are many reasons why the Liberal party should be returned to power in the present Provincial election, but the two chief reasons are the weaknesses shown by the Drury Government during the past four years and the record of the Conservative Government during the fifteen years preceeding that time.

The main charge which can be made against the Drury government is that of wild extravagance in expenditure. No matter how much the Government may try to explain matters, the alarming increase in debt and taxation makes the electors ask themselves if the pre-election pledge of economy has been kept.

The Conservative party comes to the people in a far less favorable light than the U.F.O. With one or two exceptions the leaders of the Conservative party in Ontario are the same men that the electors discarded and bundled out of office in 1919, because of their mismanagement of the affairs of Ontario. Hon. Wm. Hearst is not now the leader but in his place stands Hon. Howard Ferguson, whose record of administration as Minister of Forests and Lands, is so black that it is never mentioned from Conservative platforms or in Conservative circles. The only notable addition to the party in Kapuskasing settlement scheme started by Hon. Howard Ferguson and roundly condemned the scheme in his report. Even Mr. Nickle cannot whitewash the record of the Conservative Government of which the present leaders of the party were members.

The plain fact is that the Conservatives who are appealing to the country to-day are doing so with less prestige than they did in 1919, when the electors told them in no uncertain fashion that they were discredited and wanted none of them. The party has not changed and the electors will make sure that the Conservative party does not return to power in 1924.

The Liberals can point to a record of thirty-four years of splendid economical administration of the Province from 1871 to 1905, of administration which kept the expenditure down to a minimum and regularly returned a surplus in the treasury. The Liberals have as a leader Mr. Wellington Hay, who has won a large measure of success in his own business. Who is a business man from start to finish and is thoroughly qualified to give the Province a business like administration, based on economy and efficiency and an administration which will do much to restore the confidence of the people in the principles and the administration of the Province. There can be no doubt of the logical choice between the three parties and all electors who are opposed to extravagance and corruption in government should do their part in electing Dr. Ryan to the Provincial Legislature in the next Provincial House as a supporter of Wellington Hay, the Liberal leader. Dr. Ryan is well and favorably known to need any introduction to the Electors of Lennox and his principles are well known to the people.

In Addington, though Mr. Haines is not so well known, he has merits that fairly support a well merits the hearty support of all electors who desire good, honest administration of the affairs of the Province. Mr. Haines is making a stirring campaign and winning friends wherever he goes.

A FEW REMARKS ANENT THE COMING ELECTION

While not claiming for myself more than ordinary powers of analytical and logical perception and reasoning, there are a few phases of political philandering that would amuse if it were not so humiliating. The gullibility of the voter by the sophistry and blandishments donned once in four years for purely elective purposes has almost lost its spell, but is still practised by the "old guard."

Accepting as a truism "That Righteousness Alone Exalteth A Nation," it behooves us to consider carefully, regardless of party affiliation, mostly inherited, the principles and standards of the Candidates who are asking us for our votes. I deply believe it correct to assume that no matter which party is in power the general affairs of the Province will be administered equally, economically or extravagantly as the case may be.

If there be incompetency, or even malfeasance in office of an individual member that does not necessarily convict the Government, but should be an official who aspires to become Premier if such minister is immediately forced to resign. An incident of that kind transpired in the Saskatchewan Legislature when I lived in that Province.

The great principle at stake is "Booze" versus "Prohibition." Alcoholic beverages under some form of Government control with very lax enforcement of the law, or Prohibition and the law respected as any other law on the Statute Books.

I regret to learn by personal conversation, by reports of the returned travellers and from other authentic sources that, the word has gone out to the hotel men, and sympathizers with the liquor traffic to support with all the Conservative party it will go far toward bringing about the condition they so heartily desire.

The charge made by the Hon. Howard Ferguson in his address on the 13th, that the farmers are extravagant and incompetent, is both false and malicious in fact, and very prejudicial to the interests of the Conservative party in this county. We are noted for hard work, long hours, forced economies and careful expenditure, and consequently are peculiarly thoroughly equipped to handle the practical affairs of the state and country as well as the farm.

In recommending John Vrankman, I will just add this personal testimony. I have known him intimately through the years of youth and manhood and consider it an honor to be called his friend. I have found him under all circumstances to be genial, wholesome, fine and capable. His action as one of our representative to the Legislature of Ontario will bring to each right thinking citizen a feeling of pride and satisfaction that will be equally as full which comes to us when we speak to our member at Ottawa.

W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

The 14th annual W. C. T. U. County Convention, Hastings, Lennox and Addington and Prince Edward, was held in the Methodist Church, Picton, an Thursday and Friday, May 31st and June 1st, 1923.

Thursday, 10.30 a.m.—The opening devotional service was led by Mrs. Rev. Shorey, in a few remarks, referred to the late Letitia Youmans as the mother of the work of this district.

"Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow," was sung and Miss Cunningham, Deaconess, led in prayer.

The scripture lesson was read by Miss Thorn, after which the hymn "Work, Sisters, Work," was heartily sung by all present.

The different officers then took the platform with the President, Mrs. Gibson, of Belleville, in the chair. The minutes of the executives, which were very promising, were then given, followed by nominations of the several committees. Mrs. Currie of Trenton closed the morning session with prayer, after which the meeting adjourned for the noon hour.

2 p.m.—The afternoon session opened with a good attendance. Mrs. Bringhurst ably opened the meeting with the hymn "All for Jesus." She then gave a short address on "Loving Service." She said the one great commandment she thought was :

"Thou shall love thy neighbor as thyself."

She brought out very forcibly many good thoughts how we might as a people serve one another. Loving service cannot be bought, it is given away. What the world needs to-day is smiles. No one can say they have done their share while anything remains to be done.

If you cannot on the Ocean
Sail among the swiftest fleet,
Rocking on the highest billows,
Laughing at the storms you meet,
You can stand among the sailors,
Anchored yet within the bay,
You can lend a hand to help them
As they launch their boat away.

Mrs. Blanch Smith, of Picton, gave the children a very fine address. Mrs. Pugsley, of Toronto, replied to the welcome in a few chosen words, referring to the late Mrs. Youmans as the founder of the W. C. T. U. in Picton.

Mrs. Dr. Gibson, of Picton, then gave a very pleasing solo.

A quiz on the different departments of work was then held, which proved very interesting to all present.

Mrs. Pugsley, of Toronto, who is Provincial President, gave a very profitable talk on the wonderful work being done by the W. C. T. U. missionary in lumber camps and in the northern part of Ontario. Law enforcement, scientific temperance, health and heredity were also discussed by the speaker in her good form.

Just before closing Mrs. Graham, of Trenton, was called to the platform and presented with the County Life Membership pin by a friend in Trenton. Mrs. Pugsley presented the pin with a few words to Mrs. Graham, to whom it was a great surprise.

Mrs. Crowe, of Trenton, closed with prayer.

Thursday evening meeting was opened by Rev. M. Mellor, Pastor of Picton Methodist Church, after singing the hymn, "Forward be Our Watchword," and reading the first eight verses of 13th chapter of Romans, he led in prayer. In a short address, Mr. Mellor welcomed the delegates on behalf of the church and himself. He then called Mr. Newman, Mayor of Picton, to welcome the delegates on behalf of the town, which he did in his usual affable manner. Music by the choir then followed, which was enjoyed by all.

Mrs. Pugsley was called to the platform, her subject for the evening being "Retrospect and Prospect."

In opening her address she referred to the primitive times when the attempt was made to solve national problems by an appeal to an oracle. Subsequently the rule of the king had been supreme, but gradually it had become the custom as civilization advanced for the voice of the people to decide. She emphasized the power of the unwritten law upon which all written law must be based, the code of honor and code of morals, the righteous conviction of the people. This had been behind prison reform, the abolition of slavery, and had led to the enactment of temperance legislation. While the politician studies to be popular around election time, the statesman ponders national questions, endeavoring to establish and promote righteousness in the land and the enactment of such measures as will tend to protect the weak. The speaker enumerated several arguments advanced by those who desire the appeal of the O.T.A., easily refuting them and showing their motive to be selfishness. The W. C. T. U. had no wish to introduce politics into the W.C.T.U., but urged her workers to support those candidates whom they knew to be loyal to the temperance cause.

Rev. D. Shorey gave a very inspiring address, urging the ladies on in their good work.

Friday morning's session opened at 9.30, with Mrs. Kone, of Napanee, presiding over the devotional period. The key-note of each session was one of true Christian praise and loyalty to our Heavenly Father.

Then followed the election of officers :

Mrs. Williams, Hon. President.
Mrs. Gibson, President.
Mrs. Miller, 1st Vice President.
Mrs. Graham, 2nd Vice President.
Mrs. Case, 3rd Vice President.
Mrs. Rockwell, Cor. Secretory.
Miss Farley, Rec. Secretary.
Miss Reeves, Treasurer.
Mrs. Denison, L. T. L. Secretary.
Miss Way, Y. Secretary.
Mrs. Cole, of Belleville, closed the meeting with prayer.

The afternoon session opened with the hymn, "Take Time to be Holy," after which Mrs. Lockwood had several of the ladies take part in the participating. Mrs. Graham leading in prayer. Miss Reeves, of Belleville, then gave an excellent paper, which will be printed in full at a later date.

Friday evening the programme was prepared by the Picton Union and was a pleasing and pageant put on by the little folk of the town and which was enjoyed by all present, readings, music by the Orpheus Quartette and the Y's.

Mrs. Pugsley followed with an address dealing with the subject of the sale of liquor under government control, showing that it was not a new idea as its chief advocates would desire the voters to believe, but that it had been tried in Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Russia with disastrous effects. Government control had been tried in Saskatchewan and voted out by a majority of over 2 to 1. The opponents of the O.T.A. will support men who will favor a less drastic law and one less open to evasion. They hope to gain their end by persistent lobbying. The temperance people should be well organized and alert. Alcohol is the enemy to-day, whether sold over the open bar or under government control. It is impossible to improve an evil. It must be abolished. These few notes do scant justice to Mrs. Pugsley's logical and forceful addresses which were followed with earnest attention.

The National Anthem was then sung, bringing to a close a very successful convention.

The Resolution Committee met Friday morning and resolved :

1—That as the Moderation was made permanent by the overwhelming majority of the electors of the Province, and whereas the working of the act has been eminently satisfactory in reducing drunkenness, disorderly conduct, poverty and other offences chargeable to the liquor traffic, and whereas the Moderation League of Ontario has widely declared its policy of government control, which is but another name for government sale of intoxicants, therefore be it resolved that the W.C.T.U. will support only those candidates who have declared themselves favorable to the strict enforcement of the O.T.A. as it now stands.

2—That the W. C. T. U. persist in urging that the public school teachers co-operate with the teaching of scientific temperance that the children may be more thoroughly instructed in the laws of health and thus guarded against the evil effects of the poison from tobacco and alcohol.

3—That whereas the use of the cigarette continues to an alarming extent, we propose to beseech the parents to warn the growing boys and girls of the awful danger to their health, morals, future happiness and usefulness, as we know they can never hope to measure up to the standard efficiency of our Canadian manhood if addicted to this habit.

4—That adultery be made a crime ; that imprisonment as well as fines be imposed for such offence, and that boarding and rooming houses be licensed.

5—That we stand opposed to the Sunday sails under present conditions and would urge that proper chaperones be appointed and said halls closed before midnight.

In view of the stand taken by Attorney-General Raney concerning Sunday gambling and the enforcement of the Ontario Temperance Act : Therefore be it resolved that we, the members of the W.C.T.U. of the Counties of Hastings, Lennox and Addington and Prince Edward, in convention assembled, extend to him our heartiest appreciation of his splendid efforts.

Plan of Work Committee met Friday morning and recommended :

1—That we affirm our faith in the necessity for and efficiency in scientific temperance teaching in the public schools, and that we adhere steadfastly to our old and first purpose of securing for all the children thus brought under our schools a knowledge of the same, of health and wisdom of total abstinence from poison such as tobacco and alcohol and urge each Union to put forth every effort to organize an L. T. L. in every school.

2—Be it recommended that the W.C.T.U. take a deeper interest in the public libraries of our province and do all in their power to create a higher moral tone in the books and magazines circulated. Recommended that sufficient programmes be sent by the secretary to executives to the entertaining W.C.T.U. that they may more widely announce to the public the speakers and subjects of their addresses.

3—Recommended that we as a county W.C.T.U. deplore the demoralizing suggestions of funny pictures published in our weekly and daily papers and the bill boards placed at the entrance of the picture shows.

5—Be it known that the W.C.T.U. strenuously objects to the tented shows now being operated by amusements companies engaged at all fall fairs throughout the province.

6—Recommended that with greater earnestness we urge our Unions to observe the Week of Prayer. We would also suggest that all of our young women, including Y's Unions, should be stressed in address and especially in prayer.

Should Be Real Partners.

It is not so nearly true as it was years ago that men earn and women spend it, but it is still considerably true. Men still have control of the chief agencies for wage-earning and earn most of the wages paid. Women have the spending of most of the money that is earned and brought home for the support of families. The chief end of man is not what the Westminster catechism says it is, but his next most important end is the safety of women. Women are more contented when they have their own way a part of the time—so are men. Women's wishes should be dominant in certain departments of life, men's wishes in certain others; but there is no department of life in which women can afford to ignore the wishes of men, or men the wishes of women.

And so it is that in public as well as in private dealings between men and women persuasive works better than compulsion. Against exacting women men are instinctively on their guard. They usually avoid such women if they can. No one can afford to be driven by women into positions they do not approve of, and if they cannot run away they are likely to turn obstinate and vicious. Most men are very open to persuasion, and if led around to look at a proposal from that point of view their objections to it may disappear.—Philadelphia Record.

It is a Salt Farm.

Passing through that portion of California known as the "Bolton" one sees stretched out below him long rows of what appear to be haycocks of various design. These constitute a part of what is called the "salt farm," and the haycocks are in reality great cones of salt. Upon investigation one will find that the basin of land into which he is entering is between 200 and 300 feet below the level of the sea and that something like a hundred persons in this land are covered with a vast deposit of salt.

Each year there are removed more than 2,000 tons of salt. The salt is first plowed into ridges, then piled into conical heaps, eventually going to the drying house. From this it proceeds to the crushing mill.

It is an easy matter to mistake this area for a field of snow, because it is almost pure white, if one did not know that snow does not fall in that quarter. The supply of salt is being constantly renewed by deposits from the waters of salt springs flowing into this basin.

To remove the salt the services of Indian workmen are utilized, since these are the only men who can withstand the terrific heat and the glare of the June sun, for it is in that month that the work is done. The temperature often reaches 150 degrees.

In 1920 there were cut in Canada 4,024,826 cords of pulpwood. This would, if piled four feet high and four feet wide, stretch in a continuous line over 6,000 miles, or the distance from Vancouver to Halifax, and out over the Atlantic to Queenstown, Ireland.

Trees to the number of 10,000 were distributed among Saskatoon school children by the Parks Officials and Dominion Forestry Branch on the occasion of Arbor Day. Each child received one maple and one ash. Last year only 5,000 trees were distributed.

The Empress of France, of the Canadian Pacific fleet, now on the trans-Atlantic service between Hamburg, Southampton and Cherbourg to Quebec, holds the record for the fastest journey between Quebec and Liverpool, having crossed in 5 days, 22 hours and 38 minutes, just two hours less than the Empress of Britain.

General Sir Arthur Currie will unveil a memorial cairn at Sault Ste. Marie to Etienne Brule and his companion Grenoell, the coureurs de bois, who found the Sault and discovered Lake Superior in 1622. The unveiling will take place August 20th during Discovery Week, when the Ojibways will produce "Hiawatha" on two afternoons.

Notwithstanding that there will be an increase this year in Canadian Pacific steamship traffic on the St. Lawrence, with 17 more sailings than in 1922, Canadian Pacific officials report that ships are being well booked and that according to present indications the 1923 season will show improvement in ocean trade from both Montreal and Quebec.

Whales are reported early and plentiful this season and despatches from Victoria say that conditions surrounding the inauguration of the deep-sea hunt this year are the most promising in more than a decade. The demand for canned whale meat has become so pronounced that the prospective pack of the Victorian whalers is already disposed of. England will be the distributing market for canned whale meat this year.

A replica of an old time Hudson's Bay fort, which in days now was the nucleus of the western posts of the great company, and which still exist in the far north, will be erected at the Calgary Exhibition, running from July 9 to 14, as a part of the big Stampede feature. Special arrangements are also being made to provide a commodious camping ground for the Old Timers who will attend with the old-fashioned chuck wagons and cowboy equipment.

Running on schedule the Canadian Pacific Steamship's liner "Empress of Canada," Captain A. J. Halley, again demonstrated her right to the claim of "Queen of the Pacific." The Canadian vessel left Vancouver twenty-four hours behind the American liner "President McKinley" bound for Yokohama recently. The "Empress of Canada" docked about 2 P.M. on the "President McKinley" arrived at 8 A.M.

King Alfonso's Portraits.

The King of Spain is not reluctant to have his features portrayed on the stamps that his subjects use. The portrait of him as a baby appeared on the issue of 1889. In 1900 he was shown in the uniform of a cadet. On the stamps of 1909 his smooth-shaven countenance appears again, and the commemorative stamps of the Universal Exhibition of 1921 show him adorned with a moustache. Now, early in 1923, another new series is appearing in Spain for which Alfonso has had a special photograph taken. This time he is portrayed full face in the uniforms of the Royal Escort of the 2, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 40, and 50 centimo values. On the 1, 4, and 10 peseta denominations he appears in profile as a cavalier-general.

Got Fishing Concession.

J. H. Anderson, a Canadian, well known in New York shipping circles, is in London, England, for the purpose of interesting Anglo-Canadian financiers in a five-year fishing concession, which is understood to have secured on St. Pierre, Miquelon, from the French Government. Anderson's concession is said to be a big one, amounting to a monopoly of the fishing, wharfage and storage rights for the island, and it is understood he plans to take the fish to British and other markets.

Four passengers of the ice-bound French trawler, La Province, who were rescued from the ice floes south of St. Pierre by the White Star liner Canada a few weeks ago, are understood to have been employes of Mr. Anderson.

Mr. Anderson is the man who, three years ago, sought a contract from the Ministry of Shipping for the repair of 14 ex-German ships interned in South American waters. The action of the Ministry in sending the ships instead to German Brain dates aroused much talk and question in the British Parliament at the time.

First Use of Envelopes.

The first envelope of which there is any record was made at once against 226 years ago by Sir William Turnbull to sir James Oxdvin. The quaint old dealt with English affairs of state, and with its envelope is carefully preserved in the British Museum. At that period [illegible] afterwards, it was the general custom to fold letters and seal them with wafers or wax.

Early in the last century envelopes began to come more general use and stamps were placed on them, but it was not until after the middle of the century that envelopes came into general use. The penny post in London, and by degrees farthings used on this side of the Atlantic. The first machine for the manufacture of envelopes was patented in 1845 by Edwin Hill, an Englishman, and improvements were made the following year by Warren De La Rue and E. Hill.

A Large Honey Crop.

The largest honey crop in the history of British Columbia was garnered in 1922, registering as it did a value of $177,839, at wholesale prices. The year's output represents the remarkable average of sixty-one pounds a hive, that is sixty-one pounds a hive from 11,591 hives in 2,149 apiaries. The record per acreage was thirty pounds a hive, from 10,329 hives in 2,072 apiaries. In eleven years the province's output has grown from twenty tons to 355 tons.

Helium From Natural Gas.

Laboratory experiments have resulted in the discovery of a simpler and cheaper method of extracting helium from natural gas. ARE FIGHTING FOR OIL

THREE GREAT POWERS HAVE AN EYE ON RICHES.

Canadians Have Figured in This Interesting History of Commercial Diplomacy — France And the United States Are the Chief Rivals of the British Financiers.

With the resumption of the Lausanne Conference, oil once more will become one of the great issues before the world. What company is to have the vast oil concessions in Turkey, or in other words, what foreign power is to be the economic master of Turkey for at least a generation? The question is of tremendous importance and may affect the peace of the world; indeed the peace of the world may well be shaken again before it is settled. The parties engaged in this rivalry are the United States, Britain and France. Britain at the moment occupies the strongest position. She is in possession of Mosul, which is supposed to be the centre of the vast oil fields, and moreover, she is in legal possession by virtue of a decision of the League of Nations which gave her the mandate for Mesopotamia, or Irak as it now known. A British force is in Irak at present and the Arabs who inhabit it from a possible Turkish attack, and as long as that force remains, it is out of the question that either France or the United States should lay hands upon the half-hidden riches of the district.

As regards the good-will of the Turks, the United States is in the most favorable position, or rather Rear Admiral Colby M. Chester is in the most favorable position through the tremendous concessions that have recently been granted him. His story is an interesting one, and begins properly in 1908, when as an American naval officer he visited Turkey and was struck with its need of harbors. His investigation showed him that there were great natural resources to be developed in Turkey and he set about securing concessions. He drew up a plan for a port and railway lines with concessions of all the mineral rights lying within a certain distance from the railroad. His application for this concession was not granted because Turkey was in confusion and chaos following the revolution, but an American corporation was organized to work the concession when it was eventually granted, which Chester believed to be merely a matter of time. In 1910 the Turkish Minister of Public Works officially approved the project which then awaited only Parliamentary ratification.

Then followed the war with Italy, which was followed by the two Balkan wars, all of which held up the Chester plans. The grant as approved by the Grand Vizier contained a clause which provided that in case of delay to "force majeure," the company might on due notice being given the Turkish Government delay its operations, and the Government was thus notified, Chester believing that thus he kept the concessions valid. Then came the Great War and for eight years the Chester plans was forgotten except by the admiral, his two sons and a few capitalists who were associated with them. In 1922 there was a reorganization of the Chester company. New life was introduced by the election of Gen. George W. Goethals as president, and C. J. Barnard, a Canadian, as secretary-treasurer. The latter with Major K. E. Gayler Kennedy, also a Canadian, and whose father-in-law is J. W. Clayton of London, who is supposed to have been putting up the money, took up the promotion of the affairs of the company. These two Canadians with Arthur Chester, Admiral Chester's son, are now representing the company at Contantinople and Angora.

The Angora Assembly has now approved the Chester concessions. The latter have been enlarged since being first planned and include the construction of a railroad covering 2,400 miles of Asia Minor, with mining and mineral rights for 20 kilometers on each side of the right of way, a total territory of some 96,000 square miles. Mosul and a considerable area of the Irak lies within the Chester concessions, so the clash with British interests is obvious. Turkey made the grant as a formal challenge to the right of Great Britain to be in the province of Mosul and Bagdad. This question was discussed at the Lausanne Conference, and it was proposed that if the boundaries had not been settled within a year the League of Nations would undertake to settle them. This was not agreed to, and the dispute will be reopened by the conference that held its first session recently. One thing is certain and that is that as long as the British remain in possession, Admiral Chester's concessions in the Irak will be purely academic.

The French claims are based on an original concession for a railroad in Anatolia granted before the war broke out. It is asserted that on this understanding a loan of half a billion francs was made to the Turkish Government then in power. There are also claims put forward under the so called Bouillon treaty, whereby France surrendered Southern Cilicia to the Turks as well as a strip of Northern Syria along which the Bagdad railway runs as a boundary. The Turkish position is that the present Government, that controlled by Kemal Pasha, is not responsible for any of the the acts of any preceding Government, and that it is approving the Chester concessions not because they had been approved by one of its predecessors, but because they offer Turkey the best bargain that has as yet been proposed. In short it repudiates after the manner of Soviet Russia, and if its repudiations are not sequiesced in it threatens war. It will be the desire of the three foreign powers interested to prevent war, but on very nice point as regards Turkey they are likely to find themselves seeking different ends.

Aged Australian.

Australia's age record is claimed by Thomas Thomson, who was born at Northampton 108½ years ago, and is now living at Ballarat. He has issued a challenge to the rest of the Commonwealth to produce an older man. He is in good health, and every Sunday walks half a mile to church. At a recent mayoralty reception he climbed the stairs as well as a man of seventy. In 1920 he was presented to the Prince of Wales, to whom he remarked: "I was a lively young fellow of twenty-three when your great-grandmother was crowned queen."

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN.

Greatness Recalled By His Two Hundredth Anniversary.

The celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the death, in February, 1723, of the most celebrated of British architects, Sir Christopher Wren, forms the subject of an interesting article by Mr. P. G. Standing in the Contemporary Review.

"Surviving to the great age of ninety-one, this many-sided genius lived during the reign of Charles I., the Commonwealth, and the reigns of Charles II., James II., William and Mary, Annet and George I.," says Mr. Standing.

"One of the few surviving autograph letters of Sir Christopher was addressed by him, while yet a Westminster scholboy, to his father, and runs as follows: 'Reverend Father —There is a common saying among the ancients which I remember to have had from your mouth: there is no equivalent that can be given back to parents. For their cares and perpetual labors concerning their children are indeed the evidence of immeasurable love. Now these precepts so often repeated which have impelled my soul towards all that is highest in man, and to virtue, have superadded in me all other affections. What in me lies I will perform, as much as I am able, lest true gifts should have been bestowed on an ungrateful soul. May the good God Almighty be with me in all my undertakings, and make good and happy all upon which I shall set the tenderness of thy fatherly love. Thus prays thy son, most devoted to thee in all obedience, Christopher Wren.'

"Christopher's father was rector of East Knoyle in Wiltshire, and afterwards Dean of Windsor, and the future architect was born at East Knoyle on October 26, 1632. The dean was brother to the celebrated Wren, Bishop, of Ely, and both stood high in the favor of King Charles I. The youthful Christopher, a weakly child, betrayed very eagerly signs of an extraordinary aptitude. In his ninth or tenth year he was sent to Westminster School (where one trend towards mathematics deeply impressed the authorities) and at the age of fourteen, was entered as a 'Gentleman Commoner' at Wadham College, Oxford. His university career was a series of triumphs.

"The conflagration of 1666 immediately led to his being appointed architect not only of the new St. Paul's, but also of the great number of city churches destroyed by the fire. For the work on the new cathedral he was remunerated at the modest rate of £200 per annum. The new St. Paul's occupied him for nearly forty years, finally finishing in the reign of Queen Anne. He received the accolade from Charles II. on November 20, 1673, at Whitehall Palace."

King Was a Jockey.

Lord Durham, in his foreword to Capt. Frank Siltzer's book, "Newmarket" commends this attempt to strike out a new line of turf literature by conjuring up images of the past, and a lively impression of the love of sport and open-air pursuits which has attracted the English people to Newmarket for hundreds of years.

It is almost a history of England in little, and is extraordinarily interesting. One of the early lovers of Newmarket was John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, who, when exiled from Charles II.'s Court, took an inn at Six-Mile Bottom called the Green Man, where he and the Duke of Buckingham, both disguised, acted as landlords at the Newmarket race meetings.

In 1684 Charles II. raced against Henry Jermyn at Newmarket. Except possibly Richard II., he is the only sovereign of England who rode his horses during the Epsom meeting, and he is certainly the only one who rode races at Newmarket.

Capt. Siltzer tells many stories of strange bets and stranger races, most notable of which was Capt. Robert Barclay's feat of walking 1,000 miles in 1,000 hours for a bet of 1,000 guineas. He started his walk on March 31, 1809, and finished it on July 12 before 10,000 spectators.

"Old John" Gully, who rose from the Fleet Prison to be champion boxer, M.P., colliery owner, owner of a Derby winner, and father of two of the most beautiful girls in England, is another picturesque figure in this fascinating gallery of sporting celebrities.

Frogs Shipped to Japan.

One of the peculiarities of shipping out of the port of Vancouver was demonstrated upon the sailing of the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Russia, with a shipment of Canadian frogs for Japan. Cool space was reserved in the hold of the big liner and the travellers well packed in ice, which will preserve this detachment of the Canadian spring band commencing choir practice before the Mikado land is reached. On being taken aboard in Yokohama these frogs will be gradually warmed until they are ready to let loose and then they will be liberated on the lawns and in the fields of the Japanese importers, with the idea of giving the Japanese a new industry in the producing of frog legs.

Capitalism.

"Capitalism is a natural growth," writes Dean Inge in the "Nineteenth Century." "A living body cannot be taken to pieces and put together again like a watch, and the more civilized a nation is, the more dangerous are any attempts at amateur surgery.

"We have especially to consider that the driving force which keeps civilization in being is supplied by a variety of incentives to labor. Though there are some who enjoy work, and others who work from sheer habit, and others who work from a stern sense of duty, the large majority need other inducements, among which are acquisitiveness, ambition, the desire to make life easier and pleasanter for their children, and the fear of poverty or want. If any of these incentives are withdrawn or seriously diminished, the output of work will be reduced, and its quality impaired. A farmer who cannot sell his produce will raise only enough for his own needs. 'I would have taken the Bolshevik "paper," ' said a Russian farmer, 'if my cows could have eaten it.' The Socialist, in spite of their protests to the contrary, have never met this difficulty.

"Under a system of State ownership, either the work would have been much less efficient than it is now, or new incentives would have to be applied; and the new incentives could only be those of a slave-driver."

The Fathers of the Forest

Plants and trees, like animals, must die; and, although the duration of their fruit and flowering-time properties may be extended by artificial means, no counterpart of the monkey gland can prolong life indefinitely in the vegetable kingdom.

Nevertheless, certain "grand old men" of the plant world have put Methuselah in the shade by such a long margin that one might almost say that they are a gold as the hills on which they stand.

Five thousand feet above sea level, in the Sierra Nevada, the highest mountain range of California, are to be seen gigantic cedar trees which certainly have earned their right to be called evergreen. Living patriarchs, they have withstood the forces of nature for from 3,000 to 4,000 years.

So long have they flourished that the most authenticated estimate of their age must be 5,000 years old but it is certain that they existed in the time of David and Solomon. They are approximately in the same latitude and subject to the same climate conditions as the once mighty forests of Lebanon, from which King Hiram brought timber for Solomon's temple; but of the latter nothing but a few gnarled and shattered relics remain.

When first discovered by an Englishman less than a century ago, these mighty Californian cedars numbered ninety, all within a mile of each other, and scattered amid a grove of smaller trees of the species.

The largest of these is known as "Big Tom," and was christened "Father of the Forest." It was a veritable wonder of a tree, with great height, and a girth which could not have been spanned by five men with outstretched arms. Yet, when cut down, he did not yield so much timber as "Mother of the Forest," shorter in stature but with a thicker trunk. The bark of both these trees was nearly two feet thick.

Other romantic names given to trees in this majestic grove were "Beauty of the Forest," "Old Bachelor," "Family Group," and "Three Sisters." One of them, taken to the Crystal Palace and exhibited there in 1866, was destroyed by fire.

The cedars of California are not the only trees remarkable for their antiquity, although unsurpassed, perhaps, in size and stateliness.

Mount Wellington, near Hobart, Tasmania, is famed for a eucalyptus gum-tree, 330 feet high and 84 feet in girth at its base.

Baobab trees, first discovered by a great French naturalist, Adanson, in West Africa, are estimated to be not less than 5,000 years old. They bear a fruit about the size of a lemon, and the younger trees of the species have been transplanted successfully to South America and the West Indies. Some authorities think these trees are the oldest in existence, but in Mexico there are cypress trees believed to be even older than the baobabs.

There is no need to go so far afield as California, West Africa, or Tasmania to enjoy the romance of ancient trees.

Until half a century ago there stood at Elderslie, the birthplace of Wallace, near Paisley, an oak whose branches, according to tradition, once concealed 500 of the famous chieftain's warriors. Improbable as the truth of this historical legend is, it is certain that the tree was nearly 1,000 years old. Wallace's Oak is said to have cast its shadow over an acre of ground; but latterly it became the prey of souvenir-hunters and before long little more than the hollow trunk remained.

Ankerwycke House, Staines, is famous for a yew dating from before the signing of the Magna Charter by King John, at Runnymede, in the vicinity. Yews of from 2,500 to 3,000 years old have been known, and Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire, is famous for several examples exceeding 1,200 years.

Dotted about the country are many ancient oaks which may be anything from 1,000 to 2,000 years old.

All trees, as a rule, are more longlived than animals. The average age to which palm trees live is about 500 years, but certain species of coconut palm, found in Brazil, live to be 600 or 700.

Ivy 450 years old is not uncommon. Lemon trees and chestnuts both attain a ripe old age of 600; and the "brief span" for walnuts may be anything up to 900 years.

Senile decay does not overtake lime and spruce trees until about 1,000 years old; and the "second childhood" for olive trees may not be noticed until they have reached an age of 2,000 or so.

If hearts of oak, could only tell us their recipe for longevity! The little acorn, planted in our childhood days, is but in early youth when our brief span of three score years and ten is past.

A Large Wash.

There is a laundry in Southampton, England, which has four washtubs, but a large wash, turning out 6,500,000 pieces for the Majestic, Olympic and Homeric. The same vessels require 50,000 gallons of liquid soap, 170,000 pounds of soft soap, 63,000 pounds of soap powder and 45,000 pounds of soda to keep everything "spick and span"; 35,000 sponges and floorcloths perish in the using each year. While there may be little dust at sea there must be considerable in port, for over 20,000 brooms and brushes are used up each year. The metal work is not neglected, about 15,000 tins of polish being consumed each twelve months. —Scientific American.

Australia claims more places public worship in proportion to population than any other country.

Japanese Shoppers.

At the Mitsukoshi, in Tokio, the largest departmental store in Japan, it is still the custom to provide the shopper with slippers, so that the clean matting on the floors shall not be soiled with dust from the streets. These slippers are perhaps more like bags, and are adjusted over the feet by men who stand or sit at the entrance. The consequence is that the interior of the store is spotless, but the congestion at the entrance is an annoyance to those in a hurry. The Mitsukoshi was established some three hundred years ago.

A GIRL ON SKIS.

Only Woman in the World Who Does Ski-Jumping.

Out of the cradle on to skis is the experience of sixteen year old, Isabel Coursier, of Revelstoke, who, as far as any records are available, is the only girl in the world who does any ski-jumping. Her exhibition jumping at the recent Revelstoke ski tournament—which is one of the most famous of its kind in the world—attracted continent-wide attention. She made three jumps, sixty-eight, seventy-six and eighty-four feet, while in her practice leaps she has attained the magnificent record of ninety feet.

Of course, she has lived in the environment that boasts the greatest ski hill in the world. All the world's records, amateur and professional, have been made on the Revelstoke ski hill.

To see Isabel Coursier jump is to watch a phase of sport that is marvelous and thrilling. Fearless and graceful like some well poised eagle, she comes down the start, reaches the "Take Off," then swoops suddenly and swiftly into the air and curves to earth, gliding speedily down the rest of the hill to the "Deadline."

Isabel has been on skis all her life. From the moment she could toddle around, like all the children of Revelstoke, she had them on her feet, and learned to walk on them, shoving herself along with ski poles. Then she was equipped by her own exhibition practice on the boys' hill—first the small jump, then the big jump. She is the only girl who has been known to take the "running test down" the hill alone, as it is the custome for the "Ghost" girls, competing in the running test to come down the slide, equipped by the strongest men skiers. She is the only girl who has dared the pony ski race or "skijoring," where the entrant on skis drives behind a pony at maximum speed. She is the winner of the jumping contests—both boys and girls.

Isabel is in her second year in High School. She is still a slip of a girl—slight, quick-moving, with rosy cheeks of the out-of-door girl. She is petite and very possessed, yet combines with it all the modest charm of "sweet sixteen."

She is enthusiastic about all kinds of sport. She can play lacrosse, play basketball and at the present time is assisting in teaching swimming at the Y.W.C.A.

Buffalo Meat For You?

"In a few years buffalo meat will be shipped from Northern Canada to Great Britain," said an official of the agricultural department of the Dominion Government to the Tit-Bits' man.

"Canada has now a herd of 6,000 of these clumsy monsters of the plain. It owes its origin solely to four calves which were saved from slaughter by an Indian in 1876. Some years later they had increased to about a dozen and when they were purchased by a breed Mexican half-breed, Michel Pablo. He ran them on his lease on a great reservation in Montana, where they thrived and increased.

In 1907 the United States Government decided to throw the prairie region open to settlement, which meant that the buffaloes had to be displaced. Pablo offered them to the Canadian Government and President Roosevelt was anxious to retain them. But the Treasury Department were so slow in making up their minds that the Canadian Government stepped in and purchased the whole herd, 716 in number, at £500 a head.

The American Government even went to the length of passing a prohibition on exportation of the buffaloes, but it was too late. Experienced cowboys had to be engaged to catch and ship the animals, and three years were spent in this exciting work.

The buffaloes were placed in a special park in Northern Alberta. It is 5,834 square miles in extent, the largest enclosure of its kind in the world, and it is strongly fenced by 1,500 miles of wire fencing, requiring 1,000 miles of wire and 250,000 posts for its construction.

To-day the herd numbers 6,000 animals, all self-supporting, and finance there will amount by 1924, and over three millions in fifteen years."

Our Wheat Exports.

The total amount of wheat exported from Canada during the seven months ended March 31 was 294,208 bushels, value $436,438,670. Of this amount 134,344,188 went to the United Kingdom, 27,605,720 bushels to Canadian ports and 3,048,468 in the United States. The quantity of wheat exported from Canada during the same seven months a year ago was 76,750,000 bushels, value $150,461,950. Exports from for the seven months ending March 31 were 7,255,441 barrels, value $40,322,065, and for the year 1922, 10,970 barrels, value $31,481,234, during the seven similar months a year ago. Flour exported to the United Kingdom during the past seven months amounted to 3,173,125 barrels, of which 1,922,672 went via Canadian seaports and 1,240,453 via the United States. The figures are supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Will Be Mammoth Bridge.

The new Delaware river bridge, which is to be built by the states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey and the city of Philadelphia, is estimated to cost about $28,871,000. This bridge will cross the Delaware river from Franklin square, Philadelphia, to Pearl and Second streets, Camden, N. J. It will be the longest suspension bridge in the world. The main structure is to be of the two-cable suspension type, crossing the river with a single span 1,750 feet long, from center to center of the main piers. The clearance above mean high water will be 135 feet over a width of 800 feet in the center of the span. The bridge and approaches to be built to provide a single deck carrying an unobstructed roadway for six lines of vehicles, lines for surface cars and two lines for rapid transit, besides which there will be two tenfoot sidewalks above the roadway. The width of the main roadway, from curb to curb, will be 57 feet. The total width of the bridge will be 125½ feet. It is expected to have the bridge completed by July 4, 1926, in time for the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, when a great international exposition will be held in Philadelphia.

A Wonder of Nature

Back in the world's history the ancestors of the whale were huge reptiles living in swamps, laying eggs as the crocodile does, existing on masses of vegetation—and perhaps also on the smaller creatures.

Where food is very plentiful and other conditions favorable, creatures are apt to grow large. Where food is scarce and difficult, creatures become smaller during the centuries.

But as the dry land appeared, swamps became less. Here cut out channels for themselves, which drained the surrounding land, and so amphibians either had to become land animals or grow smaller.

Three million or so years ago the forbears of the whale left the swamps and started on a career on land. Had they not done so, they would have remained cold-blooded reptiles, laying eggs, whereas they changed into huge land animals bearing well-developed young.

But for some reason or another they came to dislike a life on land. It may have been that food was less plentiful, or that they were hunted despite their bulk, they were helpless against many enemies. With the inherited instinct to seek refuge in water, they returned, say a million years ago, on a life on the ocean wave.

The traces of the hind legs, used in their swamp and land days, are still to be found. The fore limb became fins, but when stripped they are seen to be different from the fins of fish. They take on the form of swimming, being more useful for preserving the animal's position in the water, and also for embracing the young.

The whale uses its tail for propelling itself through the water, in the same way as a boatman urges on his boat by means of a single oar in the stern, worked with a twist from side to side. This tail is an enormously powerful organ—so strong that it enables a huge whale to leap out of water as easily as a trout does when it springs for a fly.

The length of this tail is about one-tenth of the total length of the whale, but it is often more than twenty feet in breadth.

Being an animal, it can no more breathe under water than we can; but as it became necessary for it to seek deep water and to stay below the surface for considerable periods, it developed a large reservoir of arterial blood which enables it to carry on in the depths for from half an hour to an hour.

When the whale comes to the surface to blow, this extra blood is oxygenized in a short period; but the whale does not breathe under water like a fish, because it was never at any period of its career a fish; and it never possessed gills through which it might breathe in oxygenated blood. In fact, a whale would be drowned if we were to hold it under water long enough.

The whale research of its food goes down to the very depths of the ocean, and a wonderful contrivance protects its ears and nostrils from the extreme pressure it has to endure. Some authorities are of opinion that the ear communicates with the mouth, but when the nostrils are finally closed under water the whale can receive communication from others of its kind some miles away through the ocean.

The Greenland or Right whale, as from sixty to twenty feet in length when full grown and the footed sometimes exceeds double that. Its head is roughly one large, being about one-third of the whale's length, and the mouth of a full grown Right whale is about sixteen feet long, long enough to take in an ordinary boat. But the throat is quite small, possessing only the diameter of about seven inches in diameter, so that the whale cannot swallow anything very large.

In the mouth is found a series of whalebone plates, the well-known bone of commerce—with which the mammal entangles masses of small crustacea. This whalebone appears in the gristly state in the gums, and is quite absent in its early youth.

The whale has several enemies, but none to compare with man, who hunts it for its oil, which is used, at times the whales show fight, and will stave in a boat.

An "enemy" of the Essex was another whale, which, by a cardiac or sperm whale in the I. The angry whale, rushing upon that it rival with open jaws, missed its aim, and for a short distance met the I. at full tilt at the vessel.

It stove in one side of the I., and the whale's head was in the boats, and when they returned the I. was sinking. They and only just time to get a little water and a few provisions, when the I. disappeared under.

The boats made for the coast of Peru, but all the occupants save three perished.

Battles have been reported between swordfish and threshers on the one side, and whales on the other. The threshers leap out of the water and fall on their victims, striking heavy blows with their thin, long, powerful tails, when the whales, diving to escape, are met below by the swordfish and wounded, so that they seek safety on the surface.

It is feared that in a short time, unless steps are taken to prevent it, whales will become extinct. Then they will be numbered with the prehistoric monsters to whom they are are related, and another wonder of the world will be only a matter of history.

It's "Methanol," Not "Maud."

The new chemical name for wood alcohol is suggested by the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, and, according to a report of the committee on occupational diseases of the American Chemical society, progress has been made in adopting its general use.

One or two facetious chemists wanted to name wood alcohol or methyl-alcohol "Maud," and stoutly advocated such nomenclature a few years ago. Whether this was because of its death-dealing kick, similar to that of Mr. Opper's comic mule of the same name, was not explained.

More likely it was suggested by the fact that methyl, as scientifically known as "ethyl" alcohol, which, if must be admitted, suggested a somewhat affected method of spelling a girl's name.

A Splendid Meeting.

Mrs. Carpenter, of Hamilton, addressed an audience that completely filled the town hall on Saturday evening. The meeting was called by the Ladies' Liberal Association of Lennox. Mrs. Carpenter gave a splendid address on the merits of Liberalism, and the issues of the present campaign. While criticizing some of the legislation of the Drury government, and condemning the large expenditures, the speaker approved much of the Drury government's legislation. Of the Conservative leader's fitness to lead a government the speaker advised her hearers to study the record of Mr. Ferguson, form their own conclusions, and they would unanimously decide to support Dr. J. P. Vrooman on election day. Dr. Vrooman also addressed the meeting re-iterating his expressed views that the O. T. A. expressed the sentiment of the people of Ontario, and until the people see fit to change the Act, it must be upheld as it now stands.

S. S. CONVENTION AT ROBLIN

The annual Convention of the Religious Education Council of Richmond, was held in the Methodist Church, Roblin, Friday, June 15th, 1923.

The Convention opened at 2.30 p.m. with President (Alex Collins) in the chair. Rev. C. J. Wilson, of Roblin, had charge of Devotional Exercises, reading for his lesson first Corinthians, 13 chapter, followed by prayer.

Rev. T. H. P. Anderson, of Selby, gave a very inspiring address, "The Rural School and its Efficiency." Much credit was given to important work done by rural Sunday Schools.

1st. Disadvantages—The majority of people working from early morn till late at night throughout the week and when Sunday morning came they were too tired to put their best in the work.

2nd. Indifference—Parents living within reach of a Sunday School indifferent to the call of the Sunday School, not seeing the need of attending themselves, or sending their children.

3rd. automobiles—Which might be used to an advantage to carry the members of the family to Sunday School. But in many cases used as a curse, taking a great many to places of amusement or pleasure.

4th. bad weather—It being difficult for people to drive sometimes miles in snow, or rainstorm.

5th. accommodation—Most of Schools lacking equipment to properly carry on work.

Along with these disadvantages there are a number of advantages. Not like the cities and towns, where there are a great many things to attract and draw them away from the Sunday School, the rural community interest is gathered and centered in one place. The child life is cleaner, mentally, morally, physically, intellectually. For the following reason:—the life of the child in rural districts does not come in contact with the demoralizing agency that the average child of city or town does. He closed his address summing up with three fundamental principals which underlie all good teaching. 1st, teacher's preparation; every teacher should have definite preparations before coming to the Sunday school. 2nd, push; you must love the work so it will be the first thing in your life, and then get behind things and push. 3rd, personal touch; nobody is going to touch members of Sunday school better than the teacher. His life should not be a denial of his teaching. Every teacher should be consecrated wholly to Jesus Christ, working always for results; every child in the Sunday school, and every child also a worker for Christ.

Secretary J. C. Hudgins reported $118.36 for the O. R. E. C. financial drive. The objective for the county was $1000.00. Amount raised $718.36. The township objective being $400.00, amount raised $491.61 Township receipts $16.10, expenditure $8.15, balance on hand $7.95.

Mrs. R. J. Smith reported eight cradle rolls, with one hundred and eighty-nine babies. Also primary and junior departments progressing.

Report of Boys' Division—Seven organized classes were reported. Girls' Division, Life and Adults reported in five Sunday Schools in a very flourishing condition.

Teachers' Training Superintendent, Mrs. J. R. Ackerman, reported a number from Trinity and Forest Mills have taken up work but have not tried exams. which has right of a class. All securing 100 per cent. and all passing with honors.

Mrs. Darnell Denison, Superintendent of Missionary Department reported $198.76, a decrease of $47.01. She emphasized the thought to practice more self denial, and if necessary for rural, more necessary for towns and cities.

Mrs. N. B. Miller, Temperance Superintendent, reported seven schools taking up temperance work. We need just as much temperance instruction as we did four or five years ago. The boys and girls must be impressed when young if we wish them to make through temperance men and women. Ministers and teachers must stand in front line to save the children. We have won a few battles, but not the war.

Miss Laine, Representative of O.B.E.C., gave a few helpful suggestions. In looking over Standard Efficiency Chart there were a number of schools which reached the same standard of efficiency.

Rev. Wilson then welcomed the people to Roblin.

The afternoon session closed with singing of hymn 118 and prayer.

Evening session opened at 7.30 p.m. with children's chorus, "Jesus Lives," Rev. T. H. P. Anderson having charge of devotional exercises.

Report of Nominating Committee.

Supt. Girls' Division — Miss Mabel Mills, Napanee.
Supt. Adult Division—Mr. S. S. Brown, Sharps' Corners.
Supt. Home Division—Mrs. J. Hoppins, Napanee.
Supt. Teachers' Training—Rev. C. J. Wilson, Roblin.
Missionary Superintendent—Mrs. Darnell Denison, Napanee.
Temperance Superintendent—Mrs. N. B. Miller, Napanee.

President J. C. Hudgins took the chair.

Report resolutions—A hearty vote of thanks be tendered to Roblin people for the bountiful supper provided. Also a vote of thanks and appreciation be tendered Alex. Collins, retiring president, for his faithful services.

Then followed an address by Miss Laine, "Different Needs of the First Five Years of Child-Life." The first five is the most important; God makes small things sweetest and best. Where is the responsibility resting for these needs? Every child has a right to receive a religious training. Home is a responsible agency in every child's life. It is either set towards or away from. Is every boy and girl receiving this home training? Sunday school teachers and home should work together. There are right relations. 1st, right thoughts—knowledge about God; feeling, love, conduct, service. We should be very careful to get the right idea of God impressed on the young child's mind. This depends on the home. As teachers and parents we have a privilege of painting right pictures in the minds of the child. What kind?

1. As a loving Heavenly Father who is protector, one who is giver of every perfect gift. As they grow older taking Him as a Creator and personal Saviour.

2. Teaching him to pray, not little informal prayers only, but in his own thoughts and words.

3. Pictures in the home should make the suggestion that would bring about right feeling toward God.

4. Songs in home should be better than just ragtime music.

The child is capable of religious feeling before they are of thoughts, but cannot express in words. But a child's conduct expresses his character. Sow the seed and look to God for results.

The pronouncing of the benediction closed a very successful and encouraging convention.

The GREAT SHADOW

by

A. CONAN DOYLE

The great English novelist applies his master hand to the historical romance. In it he rethreads the lives of peaceful Highland folks and makes a stirring tale of love, war and revenge.

Among the principal characters are a hoyden lass who enmeshes the hearts of men, two Scotch boys and a French colonel of the Guard, aide de camp to the emperor.

The "Shadow" is the threatened invasion of England by Napoleon.

CHAPTER I.

The Night of the Beacons.

It is strange to me, Jack Calder of West Inch, to feel that though now, in the very center of the nineteenth century, I am but five-and-fifty years of age, and though it is only once a week, perhaps, that my wife can pluck out a little gray bristle from over my ear, yet I have lived in a time when the thoughts and the ways of men were as different as though it were another planet from this. For when I walk in my fields I can see, down Berwick way, the little fluffs of white smoke which tell me of this strange, new, hundred-legged belt with coals for food and a thousand men in its belly, forever crawling over the border. On a shiny day I can see the glint of the brass work as it takes the curve near Corriemuir. And then, as I look out to sea, there is the same beast again, or a dozen of them, maybe, leaving a trail of black in the air and of white in the water, and swimming in the face of the wind as easily as a salmon up the Tweed. Such a sight as that would have struck my good old father speechless with wrath as well as surprise, for he was so stricken with the fear of offending the Creator that he was chary of contradicting Nature, and always held the new thing to be nearly akin to the blasphemous. As long as God made the horse, and a man, down Birmingham way, the engine, my good old dad would have stuck by the saddle and the spurs.

When he died we had been fighting with scarce a break, save for two short years, for very nearly a quarter of a century. Babies who were born in the war grew to be bearded men with babies of their own, and still the war continued. Those who had served and fought in their stalwart prime grew stiff and bent, and yet the ships and the armies were struggling. During that long time we fought the Dutch, we fought the Danes, we fought the Spanish, we fought the Turks, we fought the Americans, we fought the Montevideans, until it seemed that in this universal struggle no race was too near of kin or too far away to be drawn into the quarrel. But most of all it was the French whom we fought, and the man whom of all others we loathed and feared and admired was the great captain who ruled them.

It was very well to draw pictures of him, and sing songs about him, and make as though he were an impostor, but I can tell you that the fear of that man hung like a black shadow over all Europe, and that there was a time when the glint of a fire at night upon the coast would set every woman upon her knees and every man gripping for his musket. He had always won. That was the terror of it. The fates seemed to be behind him. And now we know that he lay upon the northern coast with a hundred and fifty thousand veterans, and the boats for their passage. But it is an old story how a third of the grown folk of our country took up arms, and how our little one-eyed, one-armed man crushed their fleet. There was still to be a land of free thinking and free speaking in Europe.

There was a great beacon ready on the hill by Tweedmouth, built up of logs and tar barrels, and I can well remember how night after night I strained my eyes to see if it were ablaze. I was only eight at the time, but it is an age when one takes a grief to heart, and I felt as though the fate of the country hung in some fashion upon me and my vigilance. And then one night as I looked I suddenly saw a little flicker on the beacon hill—a single red tongue of flame in the darkness. And then the flame shot higher, and I saw the red, quivering line upon the water beyond, and I dashed into the kitchen, screeching to my father that the French had crossed and the Tweedmouth light was aflame. I can see him now as he knocked his pipe out at the side of the fire, and looked at me from over the top of his horn spectacles.

"Are you sure, Jock?" says he.

"Sure as death," I gasped.

He reached out his hand for the Bible upon the table and opened it upon his knee as though he meant to read to us; but he shut it again in silence and hurried out. We went down to the gate which opens out upon the highway. From there we could see the red light of the big beacon, and the glimmer of a smaller one to the north of us at Ayton. The old road had more folk on it than ever passed along it at night before, for many of the yeomen up our way had enrolled themselves and were riding now as fast as hoof could carry them for the muster. Some had a stirrup cup or two before parting, and I cannot forget one who tore past on a huge white horse, brandishing a great rusty sword in the moonlight. They shouted to us, as they passed, that the North Berwick law-fire was blazing, and that it was thought that the alarm had come from Edinburgh castle. There were a few who galloped the other way, couriers for Edinburgh, and the laird's son and Master Clayton, the deputy sheriff, and such like.

But early in the morning we had our minds sot at ease. It was gray and cold, and my mother had gone up to the house to make a pot of tea for us, when there came a gig down the road with Doctor Horscroft of Ayton in it and his son Jim. The collar of the doctor's coat came over his ears, and he looked in a deadly black humor, for Jim, who was but fifteen years of age, had trooped off to Berwick at the first alarm with his father's new fowling piece. All night his dad had chased him, and now there he was, a prisoner, with the barrel of the stolen gun sticking out from behind the seat. He looked as sulky as his father, with his hands thrust into his side pockets, his brows drawn down, and his lower lip thrust out.

"It's all a lie," shouted the doctor, as he passed. "There has been no landing, and all the fools in Scotland have been gadding about the roads for nothing." His son Jim snarled something up at him on this, and his father struck him a blow with his clenched fist on the side of the head, which sent the boy's chin forward upon his breast as though he had been stunned.

Now all this has little enough to do with what I took my pen up to tell about; but when a man has a good memory and little skill he cannot draw one thought from his mind without a dozen others trailing out behind it. And yet, now that I come to think of it, this had something to do with it after all; for Jim Horscroft had so deadly a quarrel with his father that he was packed off to Birtwhistle's Berwick academy, and as my father had long wished me to go there he took advantage of this chance to send me also.

There was from the first a great friendship between Jim Horscroft, the doctor's son, and myself. He was cock boy of the school from the day he came, for within the hour he had thrown Barton, who had been cock before him, right through the big blackboard in the classroom. I was then but ten months older and bone, and even then he was square and tall, short of speech and long of arm, much given to lounging with his broad back against walls, and his hands deep in his breeches pockets. I can even recall that he had a trick of keeping a straw in the corner of his mouth, just where he used afterward to hold his pipe. Jim was always the same, for good and for bad, since first I knew him.

Heavens! How we all looked up to him! We were but young savages, and had a savage's respect for power. What tales we used to whisper about his strength; how he put his fist through the oak panel of the gamekeeper room door. How when Long Merridew was carrying the ball, he caught up Merridew, ball and all, and ran swiftly past every opponent to the goal. It did not seem fit to us that such a one as he should trouble his head about spondees and dactyls, or care to know who signed the Magna Charta. When he said in open class that King Alfred was a fool to let little boys all felt that very likely it was so, and that perhaps Jim knew more about it than the man who wrote the book.

For two years we were close friends, for all the gap that the years had made between us, and, though in passion or in want of thought he did many a thing that galled me, yet I loved him like a brother, and wept as much as would have filled an ink bottle when at last, after two years, he went off to Edinburgh to study his father's profession. Five years after that did I bide at Birtwhistle's, and when I left I had become cock myself, for I was strong and as tough as whalebone, though I never ran to weight and sinew, like my great predecessor. It was in jubilee year that I left Birtwhistle's, and then for three years I stayed at home, learning the ways of the cattle; but still the ships and the armies were wrestling, and still the great shadow of Bonaparte lay across the country.

How could I guess that I, too, should have a hand in lifting that shadow forever from our people?

CHAPTER II.

Cousin Edie of Eyemouth.

Some years before, when I was still but a lad, there had come over to us upon a five weeks' visit the only daughter of my father's brother. Willie Calder had settled at Eyemouth as a maker of fishing nets, and he had made more out of twine than ever we were like to do out of the whin bushes and sand links of West Inch. So his daughter, Edie Calder, came over with a brave red frock and a five-shilling bonnet and a kist full of things that brought my dear mother's eyes out like a parten's.

I took no great stock of girls at that time, for it was hard for me to see what they had been made for. There were none of us at Birtwhistle's that thought very much of them; but the smallest laddies seemed to have the most sense, for, after they began to grow bigger they were not so sure about it. We little ones were all of one mind that a picture that couldn't fight and was carrying tales, and couldn't so much as shy a stone without flapping its arm like a rag in the wind was no use for anything.

So when this one came to the steading at Wester Inch I was not best pleased to see her. I was twelve at the time (it was in the holidays) and she eleven, a thin, tallish girl, with black eyes and the queerest ways. She was forever sitting out in front of her, with her lips parted as if she saw something wonderful; but when I came behind her and looked the same way I could see nothing but the sheep's-trough or the stable, or father's breeches hanging on a clothesline. And then if she saw a lump of heather or bracken, or any common stuff of that sort, she would mope over it as if it had struck her sick, and cry, "How sweet! how perfect!" just as though it had been a painted picture. When I used to tell her that she was good for nothing, and that her father was a fool to bring her up like that, she would begin to cry, and say that I was a rude boy, and that she would go home that very night, and never forgive me as long as she lived. But in five minutes she had forgotten all about it. What was stranger was that she liked me a deal better than I did her, and she would never leave me alone, but she was always watching me and running after me, and then saying, "Oh, here you are!" as if it were a surprise.

Jim Horscroft was away when Cousin Edie was with us, but he came back the very week she went, and I mind how surprised I was that he should ask any questions or take any interest in a mere lassie. He asked me if she were pretty; and when I said that I hadn't noticed he laughed and called me a mole, and said my eyes would be opened some day. But very soon he came to be interested in something else, and I never gave Edie another thought until one day she just took my life in her hands and twisted it as I could twist this quill.

That was in 1815, after I had left school, when I was already eighteen years of age, with a good deal of hair on my upper lip and every hope of more. I had changed since I left school, and was not so keen on games as I had been, but found myself instead lying about on the sunny side of the brae, with my own lips parted and my eyes staring just the same as Cousin Edie's used to do. It had satisfied me, and filled my whole life, that I could run faster and jump higher than my neighbor, but now all that seemed such a little thing, and I yearned and looked up at the big arching sky and down at the flat blue sea, and felt that there was something wanting, but could never lay my tongue to what that something was. And I became quick of temper, too, for my nerves seemed all of a fret; and when my mother would ask me what ailed me, or my father would speak of my turning my hand to work, I would break into such sharp, bitter answers as I have often grieved over since. Ah, a man may have more than one wife, and more than one child, and more than one friend, but he can never have but one mother, so let him cherish her while he may.

One day, when I came in from the sheep, there was my father sitting with a letter in his hands, which was a very rare thing with us, except when the factor wrote for the rent. Then when I came nearer to him I saw that he was crying, and I stood staring, for I had always thought that it was not a thing that a man could do. My mother sat beside him and stroked his hand like she did the cat's back when she would soothe it.

"Aye, Jeannie," said he, "poor Willie's gone. It's from the lawyer, and it was sudden, or they'd ha' sent word of it. Carbuncle, he says, and a flush o' blood to the head."

"Ah, well, his trouble's over," said my mother.

My father rubbed his ears with the tablecloth. "He's left a' his savings to his lassie," said he, "and, by gom, if she's not changed from what she promised to be she'll soon gar them flee. He doesn't say how much, but she'll have enough and to spare, he says. And she's to come and bide with us, for that was his last wish."

"To pay for her keep," cried my mother sharply. I was sorry that she should have spoken of money at that moment, but then if she had not been sharp we should have been on the roadside in a twelvemonth.

"Aye, she'll pay, and she's coming this very day. Jock, lad, I'll want you to drive to Ayton and meet the evening coach. Our cousin Edie will be in it and you can fetch her over to West Inch."

And so off I started, at quarter past five, with Souter Johnnie, the long-haired fifteen-year-old, and off that with the new-painted fallboard, that we only used on great days. The coach was in, just as I came, and I, like a foolish country lad, taking no heed to the years that had passed, was looking about there if she had not been in front for a slip of a girl with her petticoats just under her knees. And as I slouched past and craned my neck there came a touch to my elbow, and there was a lady, dressed all in black, standing in the steps and I knew that it was my cousin Edie.

I knew it, I say, and yet had she not touched me I might have passed her a score of times and never known it. A word, if she Horscroft, she asked me if she were pretty or no I should have known how to answer him! She was dark, much darker than is common among our border lassies, and yet with such a fair flush of pink blending in her dainty color, like the deeper flush at the heart of a sulphur rose. Her lips were red and kindly and firm, and even then, at the first glance, I saw that light of mischief and mockery that danced away at the back of her great dark eyes. She took me then and there as though I had been her heritage, put out her hand and plucked me. She was, as I have said, all in black, dressed in what seemed to me a wondrous fashion, with a black veil pushed up from her brow.

"Ah, Jack," said she, in a mincing English fashion that she had learned at the boarding school, "No, we are rather old for, that—" This because I, in my awkward fashion, was pushing my foolish brown face forward to kiss her, as I had done when I saw her last.

"Is this our carriage? How funny it looks. And where am I to sit?"

"On the sacking," said I.

"And how am I to get there?"

"Put your foot on the hub," said I; "I'll help you." I sprang up and took her two little gloved hands in my own. As she came over the side, her breath blew in my face, sweet and warm, and all that vagueness and unrest seemed in a moment to have been shredded away from my soul. I felt as if that instant had taken me out from myself and made me one of the race. It took but the time of the tickling of the horse's tail, and yet something had happened, a barrier had gone down somewhere, and I was leading a wider and a wiser life. I felt it all in a gush, but, shy and backward as I was, I could do nothing but flatten out the sacking for her. Her eyes were after the coach which was rattling away to Berwick, and suddenly she shook her handkerchief in the air.

"He took off his hat," said she; "I think he must have been an officer. He was very distinguished looking; perhaps you noticed him—a gentleman on the outside, very handsome, with a brown overcoat."

I shook my head, with all my flush of fury changed to foolish resentment.

"Ah, well, I shall never see him again. Here are all the green braes, and the brown, winding road, just the same as ever. And you, Jack—I don't see any great change in you, either. I hope your manners are better than they used to be. You won't try to put any frogs down my back, will you?"

I crept all over when I thought of such a thing. "We'll do all we can to make you happy at West Inch," said I, playing with the whip.

"I'm sure it's very kind of you to take a poor, lonely girl in," said she.

"It's kind of you to come, Cousin Edie," I stammered. "You'll find it very dull, I fear."

"I suppose it is a little quiet, Jack. Not many men about, as I remember it. By the way, that crabbed old doctor had a son, had he not?"

"Oh, yes, that's Jim Horscroft, my best friend."

"Is he at home?"

"No; he'll be home soon. He's still at Edinburgh, studying."

"Ah, we'll keep each other company until he comes, Jack. And I'm very tired, and I wish I was at West Inch."

I made old Souter Johnnie cover the ground as he had never done before or since, and in an hour she was seated at the supper table, where my mother had laid out our only butter but a glass dish of gooseberry jam which sparkled and looked fine in the candle light. I could see that my parents were as overcome as I was at the difference in her, though not in the same way. After supper, when she had gone to her bed, they could talk of nothing but her looks and her breeding.

"By the way, though," says my father, "it does not look as if she were heartbroke about my brother's death."

And then, for the first time, I remembered that she had never said a word about the matter since I had met her.

CHAPTER III.

The Shadow on the Waters.

It was not very long before Cousin Edie was queen of West Inch, and of her fair-weather subjects from the first. The south room, which was the smallest and had the honeysuckle round the window, was for her; and it was a marvel to see the things which she brought from Berwick to put into it. Twice a week she would drive over. And the cart would not do for her; for she hired a gig from Angus Whitehead, whose farm lay over the hill. And she was not long in finding something bringing something back for one or other of us. It was a wooden pipe for my father, or a Shetland plaid for my mother, or a book for me, or a brass collar for Souter Johnnie's collie. There was never a woman more free-handed.

But the best thing that she gave us was just her own presence. To me it changed the whole countryside; and the sun was brighter and the breeze greener, and the very air was from the day she came. Our lives were common no longer, now that we spent them with such a one as she; and the old, dull gray house was another place in my eyes since she had set her foot across the doormat. It was not her face, though that was winsome enough; nor her form, though I never saw the lass that could match her. But it was her spirit; her queer mocking ways; her fresh, new fashion of talk; her proud whisk of the dress and toss of the head, which made one feel like the ground beneath her feet; and then the quick challenge in her eye and the kindly word that brought one up to her side again.

The more I loved her the more frightened I was at her; and she could see the fright long before she knew the love. I was uneasy to be away from her; and yet, when I was with her, I was in a shiver all the time for fear my stumbling talk might weary her or give her offense. Had I known more of the ways of women I might have taken less pains.

We found our level after a time, when she saw that she had just to do what she liked and how she liked, and that I was as much at her beck and call as old Rob was at mine. You'll think that I was a fool to have had my head so turned, and maybe I was; but, then, you must think how little I was used to women, and how much we were thrown together. Besides, she was a woman in a million, and I can tell you that it was a strong head that would not be turned by her.

Why, there was Major Elliott, a man that had buried three wives, and had twelve pitched battles to his name, Edie could have turned him round her finger like a damp rag—she, only new from the boarding school. I met him hobbling from West Inch, the first time after she came, with pink in his cheeks and a shine in his eye that took ten years from him. He was cocking up his gray mustaches at either end, and curling them into his eyes and strutting out with his sound leg as proud as a piper. What she had said to him she would know, but it was like old wine in his veins.

I saw the corner of a newspaper thrusting out of his pocket, and I knew that he had come over, as was his way, to give me some news, for we heard little enough at West Inch.

"What is fresh, major?" I asked.

He pulled the paper out with a flourish. "The allies have won a great battle, my lad," says he. "I don't think 'Nap' can stand up long against this. The Saxons have thrown him over, and he's been badly beat at Leipzig. Wellington is past the Pyrenees and Graham's folk will be at Bayonne before long."

I chucked up my hat. "Then the war will come to an end at last," I cried.

"Aye, and time, too," said he, shaking his head gravely. "It's been a bloody business. I think it is hardly worth while for me to say now what was in my mind about you."

"What was that?"

"Well, laddie, you are doing no good here and now that my knee is getting more limber I was hoping that I might get on active service again. I wondered whether, maybe, you might like to do a little soldiering under me."

My heart jumped at the thought. "Aye, would I?" I cried.

"But it'll be clear six months before I'll be fit to pass a board, and it's long odds that Boney will be under lock and key before that."

"And there's my mother," said I, "I doubt she'll never let me go."

"Ah, well, she'll never be asked to now," he answered, and nibbled on upon his way.

I sat down among the heather, with my chin on my hand, turning the thing over in mind, and watching him in his old brown clothes, with the end of a gray plaid flapping over his shoulder as he picked his way up the swell of the hill. It was a poor life this at West Inch, waiting to fill my father's shoes, with the same heath and the same gray house forever before me. But over there—over the blue sea—ah, there was a life fit for a man.

For two days I turned it over in my mind, and on the third there came something which first brought my resolutions to a head and then blew them all to nothing, like a puff of smoke in the wind.

I had strolled out in the afternoon with Cousin Edie and Rob, until we found ourselves on the brow of the slope which dips away down to the beach. I gulled an armful of bracken to make a couch for Edie, and there she lay in her little fashion, happy and contented, for of all folk that I have ever met she had the most joy from warmth and light.

There was a ship coming up with the wind—a black, solid old merchantman—bound for Leith as likely as not. Her yards were square and she was running with all sail set. On the other tack, coming from the north-east, were two great, ugly, bugger-like craft, with one high mast each, and a big square sail. A prettier sight one would not wish than to see the three craft dipping along upon so fair a day, but of a sudden there came a spurt of flame and a whirl of blue smoke from the bigger, and the same from the second, and a rip-rap-rap from the ship. In a twinkling hell had elbowed out heaven, and there on the water was hatred and savagery and the lust for blood.

We had sprung to our feet at the outburst, and Edie put her hand all in a tremble upon my arm.

"They are fighting, Jack," she cried, "but are they? Who are they?"

My heart was doubling with the guns, and it was all that I could do to answer her for the catch of my breath.

"It's two French privateers, Edie," said I. "Chasse-marees, they call them, and yon's one of our merchant ships, and they'll take her as sure as death, for the major says that they've always got heavy guns, and are as full of men as an egg's full of meat. Why doesn't the fool make back for Tweedmouth bar?"

But not an inch of canvas did she lower, thundering on in her stolid fashion, while the two black bull ran on her peak and the rare old flag streamed suddenly out from the halliard. Then again came the rap-rap-rap of her little guns and the boom-boom of the big carronades in the bows of the bigger. An instant later the three ships met, and the merchantmen staggered on like a stag with two wolves hanging to its haunches. For a stricken hour the battle raged slowly across the face of the water, and still, with our hearts in our mouths, we watched the flap of the flag, straining to see if it were yet thrice. And then suddenly the ship, her spond and bland and bitch and all, set on upon her way, and as the smoke cleared we saw one of the luggers squattering like a broken-winged duck upon the water, and the other two in chase of the crew from her before she sank.

For all that hour I had lived for nothing but the fight. My cap had been whisked away by the wind, but I had never given it a thought. Now, with my heart full, I turned, upon Cousin Edie, and the sight of her took me back six years. There was the vacant, staring eye and the parted lips, just as I had seen them in her girlhood, and her little hands were clenched until the knuckles gleamed like ivory.

"Ah, that captain!" she said, talking to the heath and the whin bushes. "There is a man—so strong, so resolute! I would give a year of my life to meet such a man. But that is what living in the country means. One never sees anybody but just those who are fit for nothing better."

I do not know that she meant to hurt me, though she was never very backward at that; but, whatever her intention, her words seemed to strike straight upon a naked nerve.

"Very well, Cousin Edie," I said, trying to speak calmly. "That puts the cap on it. I'll take the bounty in Berwick to-night."

"Oh, you'd look so handsome in a red coat, Jack, and it improves you vastly when you are in a temper. I wish your eyes would always flash like that, for it looks so nice and manly. But I am sure that you are joking about the soldiering."

"I'll let you see if I'm joking!" Then and there I set off running over the moor, until I burst into the kitchen where my father and mother were sitting on either side of the ingle.

"Mother," I cried. "I'm off for a soldier."

Had I said that I was off for a burglar they could not have looked worse over it, for in those days among the decent, canny country folks it was mostly the black sheep that were herded by the sergeant. But, my word, those same black sheep did their country some rare servile, too! My mother put up her mittens to her eyes, and my father looked as black as a peat hole.

TREATING RINGWORM

A Parasite Skin Disease Affecting Calves.

Easily Spread by Contact—Symptoms Described — Treatment Recommended—Strict Isolation of Affected Animals Necessary.

(Contributed by Ontario Department of Agriculture, Toronto.)

The term "Ringworm" is applied to a skin disease of animals which is caused by a parasite of a fungus nature, and the disease results only by an animal becoming affected with this parasitic fungus or ringworm parasite.

The vitality of the ringworm parasite is very great, and often, after removal from an animal, it will live and remain active for a great length of time in a stable.

Ringworm may be conveyed or spread either by direct contact with affected animals, or indirectly by various intermediate agencies, such as infected bedding, blankets, curry combs and brushes, which have been in use.

Calves and young cattle are most commonly affected, although they are more especially when kept confined in close, damp, winter quarters, which are predisposing factors.

Adult cattle and horses are less commonly affected, although they are also liable to be attacked.

On certain premises, where ringworm occurs among calves, the parasite may remain on the walls, stalls, posts of the building and fences, and the disease may be continued on the premises and conveyed to the calves from year to year, each winter.

Symptoms of Ringworm.

The parasites attack and destroy the hair, so that the disease becomes manifested by the formation of circular bare patches of skin. The affected parts of the skin become scaly in appearance and encrusted with scabs of a silvery gray color, and when the scabs are removed a raw bleeding surface is exposed.

Among yearlings and calves the disease occurs most frequently, and is noticed to affect the regions around the eyes, ears, neck and shoulders, and, in some cases in calves, may chiefly affect the skin around the mouth and lips.

In horses, ringworm is chiefly seen affecting foals and young horses, and in them, is noticed to more often affect the upper parts of the body, such as over the shoulders, the back, loins and croup, and along the side of the neck and head.

Ringworm is also transmissable from affected animals to human beings, so that a person should guard against this possibility.

Treatment of Ringworm.

Animals affected with ringworm should be separated from non-affected animals until they have been cured from the disease, in order to prevent its spread.

The first steps in treatment should be to remove all of the bedding and litter from the stalls each day, and have it burnt and replaced with fresh clean bedding. The curry combs, brushes, blankets and other articles in use with affected animals should be disinfected either by boiling or soaking in a strong antiseptic solution, such as a 3% solution of boilic acid or creolin, made by adding three parts of the drug to 100 parts of warm water.

Stables occupied by the affected animals should be cleaned and disinfected with limewash and carbolic acid. If these precautions are followed out, the affected animals can then be readily cured of the disease by thoroughly washing the affected parts with warm water and soap to remove all the encrusted scabs and matted hair. The hair around the margins of the affected parts should be closely clipped. After washing the affected parts, they should be allowed to dry, and then dressed with the mixture of iodine. In using the tincture of iodine, it should be mixed in an equal amount of clean water and applied to the affected parts once a day by means of a small brush, or cotton swab, until all of the affected parts are completely coated over. The iodine treatment should be applied daily until all of the affected parts are healed.

Another good preparation for the treatment of ringworm is a mixture composed of equal parts of tincture of iodine, carbolic acid and water, and which is applied in the same manner as the iodine itself.

Another useful remedy for the treatment of ringworm is sulphur ointment. This is made by mixing one part of sulphur and two parts of lard together, to form an ointment. The ointment is then smeared over the affected parts each day until a cure is affected.

While the affected animals are under treatment they should be kept separate from non-affected animals on the premises until they are completely cured of the disease.—C. D. McGilvray, M.D.V., Ont. Vet. College, Guelph.

Horse Stamps Foot.

Q.: I have a horse that stamps his hind feet as if they were itchy. What will cure him?

Reply: The stamping is a sign of itching. Clip the hair off and wash the limbs with warm water and castile soap, using a stiff brush for the purpose. Then, after drying thoroughly apply a mixture composed of sublimed sulphur 1 ounce, oil of tar, 1 ounce, raw linseed oil, 16 ounces; mix. Shake well and apply. The dressing should be repeated 4 days later. Two or three applications are usually sufficient.

No family has a right to purchase any meat until each member has at least a pint of milk daily.

Grip of the "Staub-Lawine."

The Staub-Lawine, or avalanche of snow dust, is one of the dangers of the Swiss mountains. A whirlwind accompanies it, says John Addington Symonds in "Our Life in the Swiss Highlands," and lifting the snow from a whole mountain side, drives it onward through the air to overwhelm forests, to bury men, beasts, and dwellings, and finally to settle into a hard, tightly packed mass. The even, closing pressure of the particles, if indeed the wind has not already blown it out of him. A man who was once caught at the edge of the avalanche just when it was settling down to rest, was carried off his feet; in a moment the snow held his legs, pinned his arms to his sides, and crawled upward to his throat. There it stopped. He could breathe; but as the mass settled he felt that he could scarcely expand his lungs, and knew that he must soon die of suffocation. He was at the point of losing consciousness when some comrades came along running to his rescue.

Beautiful in Its Ruins.

Melrose Abbey was a beautiful abbey—now in ruins—on the bank of the River Tweed, Scotland, 40 miles southwest of Edinburgh. It was founded by David I. (1124-1153) for the Cistercian monks in 1136, and became the mother church of the order in that country. After being twice damaged by the English, it was rebuilt in a style of increased magnificence between the years 1322 and 1505, but was again devastated by the English under the Earl of Hertford, in 1545, and was totally ruined during the Scotch reformation. Since that time no attempt at restoration has been made, and the ruins have served as a quarry for the neighboring town of Melrose.

The ruined church is all that remains at the present day. It is greatly admired for the beauty of its architecture, which belongs to the Second Pointed style. Melrose Abbey is the burial place of Michael Scott, the Wizard of the Lady; Alexander II., and Johanna, his queen; William Douglas, the "Dark Knight," and the second abbot, St. Waltheof. The heart of Robert Bruce is said to be buried before the high altar.

Good in Mulching Paper.

Weeding would become a lost art if the use of mulching paper could be applied to all gardens as successfully as it is in growing pineapples, says an article in Popular Mechanics Magazine. In this case the mulching paper are rolled out where it is desired to plant, and slits are cut in the paper through which the pineapple suckers are planted.

What Did You Do with That Match?

The suffering and loss caused by forest fires are common knowledge and, yet, carelessness with fire in the forest continues. These forest fires are practically all preventable.

Save Ontario's Forests

They're Yours

Every individual who steps inside the woods should remember he is in the midst of highly inflammable property, for the upper layer of ground in the forest consists of partially rotted wood, which will burn. Lack of consideration for this gave rise to the strenuous situation in Ontario the last week of May and the anxiety for days in some settlements.

Thoughtlessness or bad judgment or carelessness cause practically all forest fires. Your co-operation, as a citizen, is needed to prevent these fires by taking the same care in the woods as in your own home.

Criminals Fled Across Canada

A generation ago "La Belle Gabrielle" was the idol of Paris.

All that Paris knew was that, after a brief career as a strolling actress, in which she had taken the provinces by storm, she had appeared suddenly at the Porte Saint Martin to turn all heads by her beauty and artistry.

Roguery and mischief danced in her great blue eyes; laughter played in the dimples of her cheeks. She was creature of sunshine and gaiety.

For a few weeks she reigned a queen of hearts. Then she vanished. It was rumored that she had eloped with a middle-aged man named Eyraud; and the rumor was true.

It was not long before the curiously assorted couple, after a period of riotous extravagance, found themselves face to face with poverty.

Whether or not Gabrielle was Eyraud's tool, hypnotized into helpless surrender to his will, we do not know. We know, however, that in the summer of 1889 they planned the diabolical crime which was to make them infamous for ever.

Early in July they went to London, where they purchased a large travelling trunk, several yards of cord, a pulley, a silk girdle, and, finally, twenty yards of packing-cloth, from which, on their return to Paris, Gabrielle proceeded to make a large bag.

In her new apartment in the Rue Tronson-Ducoudray was a cupboard in the alcove, and on the beam from which the curtain was suspended Eyraud fixed the pulley and the rope, at the end of which was a swivel. All was now remained was to choose the victim whom they were to lure to robbery and death. The choice fell on M. Gouffe, a well-to-do bailiff, and of Gabrielle's promiscuous admirers.

Gouffe was in the habit of spending every Friday night away from home. On these occasions he left any large sum of money he had collected during the day in his office; and it was a Friday evening that Gabrielle, in a flaring letter, invited Gouffe to spend with her.

"At a quarter to eight," Eyraud confessed later, "there was a ring at the bell, and I concealed myself behind the curtain. Gouffe came in. 'You have a charming little nest here,' he said as he entered the room. 'Yes,' replied Gabrielle; 'quite sweet, isn't it? It is a fancy of mine. Eyraud knows nothing of it.' 'Oh!' exclaimed Gouffe, with a laugh, 'so you're tired of me at last, are you?' 'Yes,' she answered, 'all is over between us!'

"She allowed him the speed of her dressing-gown and said, 'This is a present from a rich admirer—a very different man from Eyraud.' Then she sat on his knees and playfully tapped the cord round his neck, saying, with a merry laugh, 'What a beautiful necktie it makes!' That was the signal. I pulled the cord, and in two minutes Gouffe was dead.

"I took the man's watch and chain, 150 francs in money, and his keys. With the latter I rushed off to his office and ransacked it in search of the large sum I expected to find there. But I could not find a solitary franc; and I had had all my trouble for nothing."

With Gabrielle's help the dead man was placed in the bag she had made for the purpose and pushed into the trunk. The following morning Eyraud and Gabrielle travelled with their grim burden to Millery, a small town ten miles from Lyons, where they deposited it in a wayside thicket. Then they crossed the Channel to England on their way to Canada.

On August 13, a road-mender discovered the trunk and a key which fitted the lock. The police were able to identify the remains as those of the bailiff Gouffe; and, through the trunk, to point the finger of guilt at Gabrielle and Eyraud.

Then followed one of the most remarkable criminal-hunts on record, in which the cleverest sleuth-hounds of Paris followed the trail of the fugitives from British Columbia to Mexico.

One day a beautiful young woman was ushered into the presence of the Prefect of Police. To his amazement she introduced herself as Mlle. Gabrielle Bompard. She perched herself on the Prefect's table and told her story—how Eyraud had hypnotized her and under his mesmeric influence she had lured M. Gouffe to her rooms and played the part assigned to her in his death. After flying with Eyraud to Canada, she had taken the first opportunity to leave him.

A few months later news came that Eyraud had been run to earth, ragged and penniless, in an Havana slum. A year after Gouffe entered the death-trap in the Rue Tronson-Ducoudray, Gazzielle stood by the side of her partner in crime to listen to a sentence of twenty years' penal servitude, while Eyraud was sent to his death on the saffold.

Stead in His Element.

Robert J. C. Stead, a popular Canadian novelist and author of "The Cowpuncher" and "Neighbors," was once making an official trip through the west, observing and writing crop conditions.

It was while the train was passing through a region where the grain yield had been decidedly meagre that Mr. Stead overheard his name mentioned by a couple of farmers sitting across the aisle.

Said one: "I see the Government is sending Bob Stead out to write up crop conditions."

"Yes," said the other, "they did well to choose a fiction writer for that job."

Imported Corn.

Canada and the Scandinavian countries imported more corn in 1921 than during the pre-war days. Denmark's imports totalling 19,000,000 bushels, an increase of more than 70 per cent.

Two Great Russians.

Maxim Gorky, the Russian novelist, and Challapin, the newest great discovery in the operatic world, were brought up in the same poor-class street in Kazan, the capital of an eastern province of Russia.

Signor Nitti, Italian statesman and former premier, is an inveterate smoker, and to safeguard his health he has adopted the novel plan of smoking one year and then entirely abstaining from tobacco the next.

THE CROW AND THE CAT.

Crafty Animal Cannot Catch Wily Bird.

The crow is wise and self-possessed. In his occasional dealings with a cat he usually treats his would-be assassin as merely an annoying pest—a thing to be tolerated. Once in a while, however, we learn from Mr. H. J. Massingham in "Sons Birds of the Countryside," the crow loses his temper.

"One afternoon," writes Mr. Massingham, "I saw four crows ambling about some fifty paces from me and the cat, who seemed to be the tail of another coming out from behind the tussock. But the thing was no tall at all; it proved to be a black cat that, as much interested in the crows. He would stalk one of them and then make a flying leap for him. What did the crow do? He gazed contemptuously at the cat and let the assassin was almost upon him gravely took a couple of sidewise hops out of his reach and turned his back.

"Again and again the cat rushed, and each time one of the crows evaded him with a mixture of ease, calm and indifference as air of 'What silly you, my good friend!' that was ludicrously disconcerting to the cat. The other crows, which in feeding had made a circle round the animal, either took no notice of him at all or threw an occasional compassionate glance at him. Now and then they all stopped feeding and gazed at him as we might gaze at some person who is making a fool of himself without being aware of it. At no time was the cat more than a few feet, and usually distant from any of the birds. Finally he simply gave up trying to catch one of them and retired, looking so crestfallen that the crows, on seeing his departure, seemed to pity him more than ever.

"One day some time later I saw the same black cat stalking a solitary crow that with his back turned was feeding on the ploughland. Suddenly a big bird looked round and saw his enemy. It was too much! The crow gave a shout of rage and, leaping into the air, hovered several feet above the cat's head, and then came to within a few inches of his nose and whisked. All the while the cat sat back on his haunches as if attacked by a dog.

"Finding that he would not move the crow went higher and began to trumpet caws for all he was worth. Then, behold, from different quarters came a reinforcement of crows, all shouting encouragement to the solitary warrior. Having joined forces, the three swooped down close to the cat and, fluttering their wings, sang their hoarse battle songs. Whereupon the cat turned tail, walked, trotted, galloped and finally bolted headlong. The crows pursued him and made him right into the street two hundred yards away and then abandoned the chase."

BRITISH USE CHEQUES.

Practice Helps Banks to Improve Financial Situation.

The English are beginning to believe their habit of using cheques more and more, and cash less and less, to pay their way through life has been one of the factors in the recent spurt of the pound in its race to catch up with the dollar. Of course it has not reached the point where people write cheques indiscriminately, just as a matter of international pride, but all the newspapers have been giving serious consideration to the thought that the cheque writing habit, ever becoming more common, has helped improve the financial situation.

The idea appeared in print the other day and the London Bankers' clearing house announced that of the sums now paid into the city banks only seven-tenths of 1 per cent. come in currency and coin, all the rest being transfers of credit by cheque. Not many years ago the percentage of cash deposits was several times higher than to-day.

It has been pointed out frequently of late that the use of cheques instead of cash allows banks usefully to employ perhaps larger sums than otherwise might be possible in piling few stones upon the nation's economic structure.

The English, so their newspapers say, are more given to the cheque habit than other people, and this despite the fact that each cheque is taxed twopence. A cheque book cannot be had for the asking, as in America; it must be bought and paid for. Even those who make general use of cheques when they go to market, and, as many of the large banks have branches, there is usually a bank within walking distance of the home. The high fees for postal money orders make it cheaper to remit by cheque for amounts of over one pound, and this, too, has encouraged the cheque habit.

Psychologically some observers question whether the habit is a good one from the standpoint of thrift, since many people who would think twice before spending a certain sum out of their pockets do not hesitate to write a cheque for the amount; just as it often seems easier to tell a store clerk to charge a purchase to one's account than it is to shell out the actual coin. But others contend that the increasing bank clearings—they amounted to more than £37,000,000,000 in London alone last year—show only economic betterment but also that the average Englishman has preserved his honesty as well as his belief in the honesty of his countrymen.

Places That Inspire Poets.

"Robinson Crusoe," that wonderful romance of a desert island, was written, in part at least, in peaceful Surrey!

The cottage, Westhumble Lane, at Burford Bridge, near Box Hill, was for some time the home of Daniel Defoe.

In the garden of the Burford Hotel, Keats wrote "Endymion," and in a delightful cottage a little farther away "Diana of the Crossways" was evolved by George Meredith.

"The Revolt of Islam," by Shelley, was composed while living in a pretty cottage at Marlow, and this same poet's "The Cenci" was written on the roof of the Villa Valsovano at Livorno, on the Italian Riviera. "Enoch Arden" was written by Alfred Tennyson in the garden of his lovely house in the Isle of Wight, and Byron wrote "The Prisoner of Chillon" at a quaint little place called Ouchy, on the Lake of Geneva.

Wordsworth wrote "We are Seven" in a little cottage on the Quantock Hills, and Robert Browning composed his "O, to be in England" while being extremely sea-sick on the Mediterranean!

FEAR IS HEALTHY.

It Is A Natural and Self-Protective Emotion.

From a philosophical standpoint Dr. F. A. Hampton discusses this subject in "Discovery," noting that fear is a healthy and natural emotion, self-protective, "giving us alertness to beware of danger and wings to escape from it"—

"The animal reacts to danger without, it may be supposed, being aware of the possibilities of harm involved, and man appears to react to danger in a similar way. For although man is aware, and often acutely aware, of the possibilities of danger and the fear experienced does not appear to be always quite proportionate to the extent to which his life is threatened; for example, people were more fearful of air-raids than of the influenza epidemic, although the latter was by far the more deadly of the two. In this instance the air-raids were a prepotent cause of fear because, presumably, they evoked the emotion through its most primitive channel of stimulation, that of threatened violence; it is useful for an animal to feel frightened at violence, but to experience fear from a feeling of illness would serve no purpose.

"Against all the foregoings it may be said that it is truism that we are afraid of death, and to gainsay it is mere sophistry and playing upon words; but the above consideration seem to lead to the conclusion that we have focussed upon the idea of death, or more strictly, upon the idea of dying, a general protective emotion of fear that does not properly belong to it, and that we have, in imagination, endowed death with a fearfulness that reality does not substantiate. And it seems not impossible that by looking at death from this angle we may divest it of some of the terror that, at least in words, we attribute to it. Indeed, if we are to ourselves to examine this idea of terror, it seems to have an archaic, almost superstitious, quality, and to be incompatible with the calmness with which ordinary men and women of no particular courage or stoicism, may be observed to meet it.

"This introduces the idea already suggested, that, when we speak of the fear of dath, we are commonly thinking of the idea of dying, and here it must be borne in mind that, although death may be an undiscovered territory, yet we may claim to know something about dying. For we have on record the experience of many people who, from drowning, asphyxiation, or other causes have sunk into a state of unconsciousness that, had it lasted but a little lonser, would have passed the limit of recoverability and ended in death. These experiences show a remarkably agreeable in the absence of fear and even of discomfort; in many cases there is a feeling of lightness and freedom, sometimes of travelling with great speed, sometimes of complete tranquility that is almost pleasurable. We may quote in this connection the last words of William Hunter, the great anatomist: 'If I had strength enough to hold a pen I would write down how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die.'"

In Paris Graves.

Many illustrious foreigners have been buried in Paris, and of them all Chopin and the German poet Heine appeal most to the affectionate memory of the public. It is therefore causing a little disappointment and uneasiness that Poland should be desirous of removing the composer's ashes from Pere Lachaise to place them with his heart in a Warsaw church. Chopin's body was buried in a little Polish soil when the heart was laid to rest in the vast Parisian cemetery in 1849 not far from his great friend the painter Delacroix. Heine lies in Montmartre cemetery, and a china jar set upon the tomb used to be always full of German visiting cards, left there by tourists from beyond the Rhine. Few cards have been left on the German poet since 1914, but there is always a fresh flower at his feet, placed there, it is true, by a Parisian florist; who was commissioned years ago with the upkeep of the tomb by a group of German admirers. They have written now to Paris to say that they are unable to begin sending their quarterly payments for the purpose because the condition of the mark makes the expense prohibitive. The florist has replied that the tomb will continue to be looked after and that if in the future when the mark recovers they like to pay his bill they may do so, but the tomb will be kept up in any case.

Origin of the Broad Arrow.

The recent disappearance of the broad arrow from the convict's attire has aroused much interest, and there is curiosity as to the origin of this curious Government mark. We owe it to Henry Sidney (created Earl of Romney in 1694), then Master of the Ordnance. Finding that the Government had no distinguishing mark to enable its property to be easily identified, Sidney caused all articles to be branded with his arms, the "Pheon," or "Broad Arrow," and this ever since has been used by the Government.

My First Child

Glen Allen, Alabama.—"I have been greatly benefited by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for bearing-down feelings and pains. I was troubled in this way for nearly four years following the birth of my first child, and at times could hardly stand on my feet. A neighbor recommended the Vegetable Compound to me after I had taken doctor's medicines without much benefit. It has relieved my pains and gives me strength. I recommend it and give you permission to use my testimonial letter."—Mrs. Ida Rye, Glen Allen, Alabama.

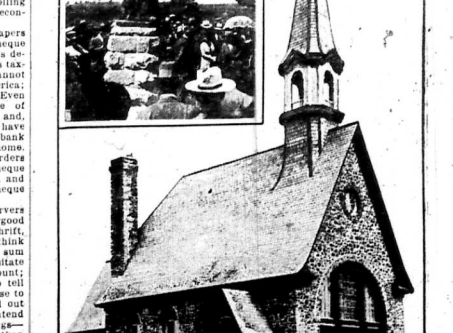
Acadians to Visit Grand Pre



Grand Pre Memorial Chapel and, inset, the Statue of Evangeline.

THE "Land of Evangeline" will become the scene of another celebration on August 9th. At a meeting of the Grand Pre Memorial Committee recently held at Moncton, arrangements were made for an excursion to Grand Pre on that day. Special trains will carry people from all points in Nova Scotia to the little town from whence the long suffering Acadians were deported by the English in 1755, and it is anticipated that people will join the excursionists from all parts of the Dominion and the United States.

One of the features of the day's programme will be the unveiling, in the Memorial Chapel, of a statue of the Madonna, which will be erected in recognition of the noble work accomplished by the Acadian National Societe L'Assomption, the Madonna being the patron saint of this society. The statue, which is 7½ feet high rests on a 6 feet base, has great beauty of design, and is claimed to be the finest of its kind on the American Continent.

As conditions are not as bright as they might be financially in Acadia the interior of the Memorial Chapel will not be completed this year but a committee has been formed to collect Acadian relics and souvenirs, and to obtain, if possible, further works of art that the interior of this institution be in keeping with the statue. While the exterior of the chapel is plain it is the intention of the Committee to have the interior as elaborate as possible. It will not be used for church purposes but as a museum and white and tinted marble with mosaic flooring will be used with artistic effect. Many will visit Grand Pre, not so much for their interest in Acadians, as because it is the setting of Longfellow's story of the deportation. Evangeline is honored in immortal stone and large numbers have journeyed, particularly from America, to lay their tributes on the statue which is a representation not only of the heroic Acadian maid, but to the great poet whose writings she once inspired.
